A GRUB-STREET BIBLIOGRAPHY

For a combination of reasons, the period 1890-1905 brought a high-water mark in literary journalism in England. Quite suddenly within that period there rose and fell an excited interest on the part of the leading London newspapers in all forms of creative literature. In part the interest stemmed from the host of "minor" poets--and their critics--who rushed to fill the vacuum left by the deaths of Browning (1889) and Tennyson (1892). More fundamentally, it marked the first response of the newspapers and popular journals to the reading public created by the Elementary Education Act of 1870. "Half a century ago," wrote one observer, "the public that now finds its sole mental food in newspapers did not exist."1

Whatever the causes, the newspapers of the 1890-1905 period were intimately engaged with the creative literature of their time. As one instance, there was the debate which raged in August-September 1898 between Stephen Phillips, the dramatic poet, and James Douglas, his critic, on the front page of the popular sporting newspaper, the Star. The subject of their debate -the just and proper scansion of blank verse! Such issues were being raised and disputed in many a British newspaper in the 1890's. By 1902 the literary interest had begun slowly to subside. With the establishment of the (London) Times Literary Supplement in January of that year,<sup>2</sup> newspapers tended to confine themselves again to news and reviews, and to leave original and creative literature to the literary journals and other publishing houses.

To the mass of literature in newspapers of the late 1890's and early 1900's there were untold numbers of contributors. Virtually every major writer of the period made some contribution to the journals and daily press. Often an author would collect his contributions later, with or without edition, in book form; quite as often the contributions remained un-republished. A survey of the newspaper and periodical literature of the 1890-1905 period brings one frequently to the work of novelists such as Conrad,

2. Prior to 1902 the Times had remained notably aloof from the literary preoccupation of other London newspapers of the time.

Hudson, Gissing, Hardy, Moore, Stevenson, and Joyce, and of such poets as Yeats, Thompson, Davidson, Housman, Meredith, and Masefield. Literary critics of the time got a major portion of their experience in the newspaper and weeklyperiodical columns--William Archer, Quiller-Couch, Shaw, Saintsbury, Lang, Gosse, Chesterton. American authors found a wide audience through the same medium--Bret Harte, Stephen Crane, Mark Twain, Theodore Dreiser. It is difficult to determine how far this vast array of writing has been reckoned with in critical studies of the authors involved. Some of the literary journalism of Lionel Johnson, Francis Thompson, and George Bernard Shaw has been salvaged.<sup>3</sup> But of the territory as a whole there has been no systematic charting.

It is the purpose of the present study to illustrate what can be found of the work of one author, the poet John Davidson, in this veritable wilderness of journalistic contributions.

3. See for example Lionel Johnson, Post Limnium (ed. Whittemore, 1911) and Reviews and Critical Papers (ed. Shafer, 1921); Francis Thompson, Literary Criticisms (ed. Connolly, 1948); and George Bernard Shaw, Our Theatres in the Nine- ties (3 vols., 1932). A similar collection was made of the journalistic writings of John Davidson in Edward J. O'Brien, ed., The Man Forbid, and Other Essays (1910).

Such a study begins and ends in uncertainty. The standard periodical and newspaper indexes are of little value, being sketchy or nonexistent for this period and this type of publication. More useful are the published references by Davidson himself, 4 and references made in reviews of the poet's work and in interviews with the author.<sup>5</sup> On rare occasions Davidson's manuscript letters give a clue. Most valuable of all printed sources are the newspaper and periodical obituaries and summary accounts of Davidson's career.<sup>6</sup> Written as they usually are by men who knew the poet personally, these sources provide an intimacy and accuracy of detail which no other source can give. Little by little, by cross-reference and triangulation, the likely areas of search are suggested. Yet in the last resort there is no substitute for the one surest method of search, the laborious scanning of page after page of every journal and newspaper, for

4. Notably in the headnote to Miss Armstrong's and Other Circumstances (London, 1896).

5. See for example "A Scotch Poet," Critic, XXIII (Feb. 23, 1895), p.146; and Jane T. Stoddart, "An Interview with Mr. John Davidson," Bookman, I (March 1895), p.87.

6. See for example Annual Register for 1909, p.117; J. Richmond Stewart, "A Glasgow Poet," Glasgow Evening News (Nov. 17, 1928). every month and year in which the poet may have made a contribution.<sup>7</sup>

Even at the end of such a page-by-page search, the bibliography which concludes this article is admittedly incomplete. Three distinct clues to published statements of Davidson's have led me nowhere.<sup>8</sup> For none of Davidson's three prose-miscellany volumes--Sentences and Paragraphs (1893), A Random Itinerary (1893), and A Rosary (1903)--have I found complete journalistic sources, though they apparently do consist wholly of essays and excerpts culled from his Grub-Street work. Most baffling of all, the Weekly Review, which the poet sub-edited during his first months in London, and which carried early contributions of William Butler Yeats, appears to have vanished completely.

7. Even here the obstacles of initialsignatures, anonymity, and pseudonymity still remain. For aid in searching many British newspapers I am deeply indebted to Mr. A. D. Holland and others of the Newspaper Library staff of the British Museum.

8. Anonymous column, "Literary Gossip," Outlook, VII (March 23, 1901), p.252; John Davidson, "Wordsworth's Immorality and Mine--IV," Outlook, XVI (July 22, 1905), p.95; and "A Woman Who Writes for her Bread," "Indecent Novels," (London) Times, July 16, 1907, p.3.

As it stands, the bibliography comprises 296 contributions made by John Davidson to 33 different newspapers, periodicals, and occasional volumes. In quantity these contributions are at least equal to all his forty published volumes put together. In quality they include some of his loveliest nature description of walks through the southern English countryside; they reflect as well the tortured internal debates of his later years, and his angry retorts to the critics who attacked him. They greatly extend the known volume and range of Davidson's literary work. Frequently the poet edited these journalistic writings and published them later in book-form; yet even for such works a systematic bibliography is of distinct value, for it establishes a more exact chronology of his intellectual and creative activity than has been possible before. Our understanding of every aspect of Davidson's work is increased by a knowledge of his long labors in Grub Street.

For the scholar with world enough and time, an imposing challenge awaits, in the compilation of a literary bibliography of newspapers and journals for the entire 1890-1905 period. Such a bibliography would immensely enrich our knowledge of a literary period which is still far too little understood.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF DAVIDSON'S PERIODICAL AND NEWSPAPER CONTRIBUTIONS

This bibliography seeks to list all John Davidson's writings which first appeared in periodicals, newspapers, and occasional volumes. Where a work appeared twice in such form, only its first appearance is noted. The left-hand column lists the year, month', and day on which each item appeared; the next column lists its title and source. The right-hand column lists facts of later publication, if any, in book-form by John Davidson.
